Epistemology and Science: Some Metaphilosophical Reflections

Richard Fumerton
University of Iowa

ABSTRACT. This paper is a metaphilosophical investigation into the relationship between science and epistemology. I defend the rather radical view that philosophical questions in epistemology can be answered either a priori or "from the armchair." In making that case I suggest parallels between how I think one should conceptualize the study of ethical philosophy and how I think one should conceptualize the study of epistemology.

Philosophy is an unusual field. Although we make progress of a sort, the progress is decidedly slow, and we rarely reach any sort of consensus on the answers to truly fundamental philosophical questions. By contrast the sciences, particularly the hard, practical sciences, have advanced by leaps and bounds. One can't help but marvel at high-definition television, cell phones, the Internet, computers that work at incredible speeds, medical advances, and the like. In my lifetime the world has changed dramatically as a result of these discoveries. Meanwhile, we philosophers are still debating whether the mind is the body, whether mental states are brain states or functionally defined states, whether there are universals, whether good is an objective property or a projection of subjective value, and whether knowledge can be defined in terms of true belief and some third condition. It is perhaps no wonder that many philosophers are turning to some form of science in the pursuit of philosophical truth.

These reflections are meditations about the Spiritual Dimension of Existence (SDE). The SDE Worldview assumption holds that all human beings possess God's Endowment: the Image of God. Each individual is a Created-Person with a vast library of spiritual characteristics, fashioned together in profound complexity and experienced in daily life and thought. Everyone at some stage of life will ask in wonder what lies beyond the Epistemic Horizon. Avoidance of ultimate questions concerning significance, meaning, belief, truth, knowledge, and value is not a live option. Suppressing the quest for meaning as bogus inevitably proves to be problematic for this choice assumes meaning itself. Scientific naturalism's hypotheses, theories, or models have proven to be unsatisfactory because its worldview arbitrarily limits knowledge to its methods and s – all of which are probabilistic and subject to subsequent revision or rejection. Its assumption of a closed space-time system of matter in motion plus chance, wherein all reference to the supernatural is suppressed or denied begets a reductionist frame of reference leading to nihilism. "Man is a useless expression" resigns one to meaningless existence, or Bertrand Russell's "unyielding despair." Held to the prison of naturalism's worldview, Russell's is inevitable. However, beyond the boundaries of materialism, the supernatural beckons with a question: Who is the Absolute and Ultimate Point of Reference for all thought and life: Man or God? The author chose God and the prospect of "unyielding hope" rather than the despair of nihilism leading to suicide. Part One contains reflections on a sample the Endowment's Image of God: Life, Memory, Meaning, and Truth. Part Two records self-examinations on Confusion, Misology, Logic, and Destiny. Part Three offers reflections for the faith of "unyielding hope": Gospel, Resurrection, Time, and Worldview. A Glossary of Terms followed by an Index closes the main portion of the work. Appendices with related subject matter and various resources close this project.
