You love doing arts and crafts. What you don't love is when you spend more time looking for a supply or tool you know you have someplace than you spend actually making art. You get frustrated when you come home from a trip to the store and realize that you have four of that supply you were convinced you'd run out of.

Learn how to get the most from your supplies and from your time with the steps in this book. Gather all the supplies and works-in-progress that you have stored throughout your house so you can see what you have. Sort your supplies and tools and look for duplicates, excess, and materials you no longer have an interest in using. Then, consider the storage space you have available as well as the activity space you need to complete your projects. Discover how different organizing tools can help you make the most of your space.

If you love making art as a hobby or as a profession, you know you don't want to waste time looking for supplies or trying to clear off a workspace when you'd rather be working on a project. Clearing and optimizing your space will open up your time creating and doing what you love.

Learn more about simplifying your stuff at www.ALessClutteredLife.com.

You decide you need to organize your art and craft supplies. So, you go looking for the best storage bin or unit or rolling craft cart that you can find. Stop! You are starting with the wrong step.

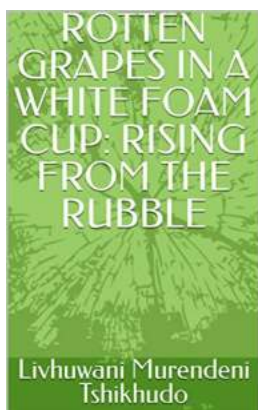

When it comes to organizing art and craft supplies, you need to evaluate what you have and what you want from your creative space. You need to consider what supplies and tools you use and how often you use them so you know where to store them and in what to store them so you can access them with fuss.

Whether you have a craft room or a craft closet (or want to create one) or you make your creations in the dining room or home office, you can learn how to make the best use of the space you have.
