The Greeks, on the other hand, believed in a more hands-on approach, with parents taking an active role in the education and development of their children. The cultivation of virtues such as courage, wisdom, and justice was prioritized as it was believed to be essential for the future rulers of the city-state.

The Middle Ages: A Time of Dynasties and Duties

The Middle Ages brought about a fundamental shift in royal parenting, with dynastic marriages becoming a powerful tool for political alliances. The upbringing of future monarchs was no longer solely focused on their personal growth; it now carried the weight of shaping the destiny of kingdoms.

Among the most notable figures of this era is Eleanor of Aquitaine, one of the most influential queens and mothers in history. Renowned for her intelligence and political acumen, Eleanor played a pivotal role in the upbringing of her sons, who would go on to become some of the most powerful rulers in Europe.

The Renaissance: Education as a Path to Power

The Renaissance ushered in a new era of enlightenment, and royal parenting took on a more scholarly tone. Education became a key focus, and monarchs sought to provide their children with the best available tutors and mentors.

Perhaps the most famous example of Renaissance royal parenting is that of Henry VIII and his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth. Despite the tumultuous nature of his reign, Henry ensured that his daughters received an extensive education in disciplines such as music, language, and politics, setting the stage for their future roles as queens.

Enlightenment and Modernity: Adapting to Changing Times

As the world moved into the era of enlightenment and modernity, so too did the approach to royal parenting. Kings and queens began to embrace more progressive ideas on child rearing, focusing on fostering emotional connections and individual freedoms.

One of the most beloved royal parents of this era is Queen Victoria, whose devotion to her nine children defied the norms of her time. She aimed to provide her offspring with a loving and nurturing environment while also preparing them for the responsibilities that awaited them as future rulers.
