A man is employed to write the "story" of a woman's life; it is to be her biography. The story as it develops creates a version of what its subject dreams to be the story of her life, for how she wants to live it. Then the biographer, who is a possible suitor, he is to help fulfill the woman's dreams through the telling of her story. He is given some information by the subject, but not enough, so it is up to him to create what is going to happen in the hope that he might be able to come up with what his employer wants to hear.

The working out of the tale, creating a future, is a long seduction for which the biographer has to figure out what the conditions are that he has to fulfill in order to meet with the subject's favour and win her affection. The imagined future between the two as it unfolds becomes romantically and sentimentally impossible and then unattainable. The created love lapses into romantic extremism.

Running parallel to the illusions of the younger couple are two older people who are defining reasonable parameters that they can agree to live by, so as to help each other and get by. Their love does not overextend itself. They take what they can get, and they get it.

The action of the play occurs within a context of environmental threat and as the characters are occupied with their small concerns they are aware of a large unpleasant fate that will finish them off. The "comfort of romantic and practical love" that they are looking for, is an escape from the larger threat.
