CHAPTER 2: THEORETICAL PERSPECTIVES ON SEXUALITY

Lecture Outline

Are You Curious?

Questions are posed regarding male preference in female figures, arousing nature of scents, and patterns of sexual interactions.

Theories provide the framework for academic endeavors by answering the question of why people engage in the behaviors that they do.

1) Evolutionary perspectives focus on the effect of evolution and the process of natural selection in addressing human sexual behavior.

- a) Sociobiology offers the premise that cultural conventions in mating and pair bonding stem from successful reproductive strategies.
 - i) Standards of attractiveness are generally those traits indicative of health, increasing chances of reproductive success.
 - ii) The nuclear family, pair-bonding, and infant attachment are adaptive conventions that improve the chances of offspring survival.
 - iii) Sexual selection offers an explanation for gender differences in mating strategies. In general, males compete for women through a display of power and resources, while females must effectively choose which males will have the opportunity to mate.
- b) Evolutionary psychology proposes that emotional and cognitive functioning evolved in response to selective pressures. Evolution proposes that present forms of living things have taken successive generations and gradual changes. Those most likely to pass on their genetic code are those who make sound cognitive choices and who produce offspring best suited to do the same in a process known as sexual selection.
- c) Sexual strategies theory finds that male strategies change in response to personal characteristics and environmental contingencies. New research indicates that females also engage in competition for access to males.

2) Psychological theories pertaining to sexuality primarily consist of the following:

- a) Psychoanalytic theory was the brainchild of Sigmund Freud, who viewed human behavior as a resolution between libido (sex drive) and thanatos (death instinct).
